

FIRST GERMAN COLONY

An Anniversary Event Soon to Be Commemorated Here.

FOUNDING OF GERMANTOWN

Arrival of First Organized Band of Immigrants Under Pastorius in 1683 to Escape the Rule of Prince and Priest—First Protest Against Slavery—Builders of the First Paper Mill.

The German societies of the District of Columbia are making preparations for the celebration of the 220th anniversary of the landing of the first German colonists in America. It will be held on or about November 23 to 28, on a scale far surpassing in grandeur and liberality anything of the sort ever attempted by the local Germans, and it is not going too far to say that it will only be eclipsed by the celebration which was held in 1883 in Germantown, Pa., in commemoration of the landing, 200 years before, of the first German settlers in this country. With characteristic patriotism and race pride, the German citizens of Washington have already subscribed a sum of money far in excess of actual requirements, and no stone will be left unturned in the effort to make the event one of the most notable demonstrations of patriotism and racial solidarity of the year. In view, therefore, of the approach of this celebration of one of the most important events in the early history of America, it is not to be wondered at that Washingtonians, viewing with astonishment the steps that are now being taken toward the realization of a fitting commemoration of the landing of the first German colony in America, should desire to know something further concerning an event about which little is known, despite the fact that much has been written on the subject.

Religion and Princely Misrule.

A distinguished American historical writer, reviewing the subject of the first German settlements in this country, thus strikes the keynote of the situation in the following apt terms:

"The large emigration of Germans to America in colonial times seems on first examination a mysterious phenomenon. The Germans were abhors in language among the mainly English-speaking colonists; were obliged to undertake a long and toilsome journey before reaching the ocean, over which they must sail for weeks and months, amidst the greatest hardships and dangers, before they could even attain to their desired haven; the crown government, so soon as the size of the movement attracted attention, did all in its power to restrain it, and the English provincial authorities received the foreigners by no means with open arms; yet the cry was still 'They come.' The well-known energy, resolution, and fondness for emigration characterizing the Germans of earlier times—the merchants of the Hansa, whose flag was on every sea and whose warehouses and trading posts dotted every land and strand—had been crushed out of the seventeenth century Germans by the fearful paine forte of dire of the Thirty Years' war. So Americans who saw the tide of strangers rising on their shores were naturally surprised, and the few of their descendants who know the propertions of the early German emigration to America are still astonished at it."

Nevertheless, the causes were not far to seek. At the time these settlements were made Germany was undergoing trials of a character that would have proven the ruin of some nations, but which in that case proved her making and salvation. The Reformation had passed. The victory which the Protestants had gained over Europe had given way on every hand to indifference and formalism, and, taking advantage of this ill in the rising storm of revolution and freedom, the Jesuits, that new weapon of the church, had thrown themselves into the breach, prosecuting their course so diligently that by the middle of the seventeenth century they had to a considerable extent supplanted the Holy Mother Church over half of the countries which in the preceding century had gone over to Protestantism.

In Germany honest men found satisfaction neither in Lutheranism nor Catholicism, and thus it happened that the dawn of the seventeenth century saw Germany the hotbed of every strange doctrine which the mind of man could devise. Some, of course, were the mere froth of idle dreamers, but the majority of the adherents of these new and strange tenets were honest and practical men; the groundwork of above all things was a love of freedom and a desire to be free of the two great curses of monarchial Europe on society, namely, priest and prince. All Germany was in a state of anarchy, so that it is not wonderful that the best men and women of the time preferred the uncertainty of life among aliens to a miserable existence subject to the whims and caprices of a tyrannical prince.

William Penn Becomes Interested.

These facts were well known to William Penn, at the time he formulated his plan for establishing a haven for harassed and persecuted sects in America. In fact, the Quakers were a modification of the German Mennonites, who were in turn the descendants and successors of the Waldensians, that in 1677, when William Penn published his plan to Holland and Germany, he found thousands of good people who thought, worshipped, and believed as he and his brother and sister Quakers believed.

In Holland and Germany he met the Mennonites, whose metropolitan, even at that time, was a long one, and that a very wide one, and he did not escape the usual observation and longing to be rid of their religious tyranny, which was not the least universal throughout Germany, and the Low Countries. Consequently, it is not at all surprising that when, some years later, Penn obtained from the English king a grant of the territory of Pennsylvania, he wrote back to his father, speaking of the "Benjamin Furley" to be named Pennsylvania, as an excellent place for the oppressed sects of Germany, where they would always be termed "Protestants" and "Puritans." Penn, in the German language, describing the new territory to his father, said: "These were scattered throughout Germany. They had been persecuted by Penn and some months before they organized two colonies, one at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and the other at Greifeld, Germany. The Frankfort company, despite the fact that it numbered among its stockholders many distinguished men and women of the day, never amounted to much, but the one at Greifeld, made up of Mennonite settlers, was more active. It consisted of a party of an important part in effecting the first voyage sent over by Furley, which resulted in the first colonial settlement of Germans to America."

Among the number of Anabaptists who longed for some relief from the conditions which surrounded them was Francis Daniel Pastorius, a man who had traveled and led a great life for one of that set, and whose wife, moreover, was a woman of original views and energetic character. In one of his autobiographical memoirs, Pastorius thus describes how he originated the determination of leading a colony of his co-religionists to the New World. He says: "Upon my return to Frankfort in 1682 I was glad to enjoy the company of my former acquaintances and Christian friends assembled together in a house, called the schoolhof, viz., Dr. Spener, Jacobus van de Walle, Eleanor, von Merlau, &c., who sometimes made mention of William Penn, of Pennsylvania, and showed me letters from Benjamin Furley; also printed relations concerning said province. Finally the whole secret could not be withheld from me that they had purchased 55,000 acres of land in this remote part of the world. Some of them entirely resolved to transport themselves, families and all. This begot such a desire in my soul to continue in their society and with them to lead a quiet, godly, and honest life in a howling wilderness that by several letters I requested my father's consent, besides 250 relictshalers, whereupon I went to Krisheim and immediately prepared for the journey." Thus the first emigration of Germans to this country was from religious motives. It is true that the wars waged by the French against the German States under their kings—Louis XIV, Louis XV, and Louis XVI—began in 1672, but it was not until 1690 that they became so serious as to drive whole communities of Rhineland Germans to this country. Accordingly, a company of immigrants was made up, and Pastorius sent on in advance to prepare the way. This company, all of whom were Mennonites, set sail from Frankfort in the ship Concord, reaching Delaware Bay and Philadelphia on October 6, 1683.

The First German Immigrants.

In her excellent work entitled "The Germans in Colonial Times," Miss Lucy F. Bittinger states that the exact number of the colonists who came over in the Concord is not definitely known, for the reason that the master of that vessel entered everything as freight. In the master's accounts, it appears that the ship landed some "thirty-three freights," which includes both passengers and baggage, and that inasmuch as a child of eight or ten years was counted as forming "a quarter of a freight," it is hard to tell what the actual number was to a certainty. It is believed, however, that thirteen families, or, in other words, forty or forty-two individuals, were very near the exact number of the first German colony in America. Following their landing a warrant was issued by Penn and his coadjutors placing at the disposal of these Mennonites 6,000 acres of land near Philadelphia, which from that time forward was known as "the German township," and which finally, as both towns grew in size, came to be known as "Germantown."

Such was the first German settlement in America. Subsequently, from 1690 to 1780, during the wars waged by Louis XV and Louis XVI of France against the German States, when the Palatinate was desolated time and again, the tide of German emigration to this country reached the high water mark, but this—the landing of Pastorius, with his "thirty-three freights"—was the initial movement in German emigration to the New World.

In all history there is no more striking example of Teutonic honesty than in the history of this colony. Philosophers, political economists, and sophists would have the world believe that when men are given free reign to do as they like it is not long before they either degenerate to the level of savages or else place their necks under the yoke of some tyrant worse by far than the one from which they had previously escaped. That, in other words, humanity needs and requires a deal of care and watching, yet nothing so completely contradictory these assertions as the history of the Germantown colony. Like many another set of honest men, they simply asked to be left alone. The first season was rather hard on the new settlers, speaking of which Pastorius says: "It could not be described, nor would it be believed by coming generations, in what want and need and with what exertion, contentment and persistent industry this German township started." Yet all were cheerful and full of hope, so much so that Pastorius, who was of a prophetic turn, perpetrated a long poem upon the future of the settlement, much of which was subsequently fulfilled to the letter. The first stanza of this poem is as follows:

Had to posterity
Had to posterity of Germanopolis,
Let the young generations yet to be
Look on you upon this:
Dear German-land, O sacred hearth, and Home,
And where the will best name,
Let paths be planned as a

First Protest Against Slavery.

In their own country their energies had been hampered and bound down by all manner of petty laws and prohibitions. In their new home, where they were free of all this, they gave free rein to their love of industry, and the result was the first paper mill in America, built by William Rittinghuys, the progenitor of the famous David Rittinghouse, linen work-writer, for a long time, the best linen goods in America were manufactured; spinning mills which were the forerunners of the present Germantown cotton industry; distilleries, tanneries, factories. In short, the town soon became the great manufacturing center on the continent. True to their religious beliefs, the Germans who came over under Pastorius wereaverse to negro slavery from the start. Unlike the English Quakers, they would neither tolerate nor wink at a trade which, from their viewpoint, was radically evil and disgraceful, so that, consequently, it is not surprising that the first anti-slavery petition to appear in this country emanated from these good people. This petition, signed by Pastorius, Rittinghuys, Reynier Jansen (an amusing old German printer, and an unusually bad one at that), Gerrit Hendricks, the two On Den Graeffs, and others, was presented at the regular monthly meeting of the Quakers, held at the residence of Richard Worth, in Philadelphia, in 1688. In the light of modern thought, the intense enthusiasm is positively amusing. Part of it read thus:

"I have heard that some have sold or handed in the market of this country, many a slave for all that of his own blood, sweat and faint-heartedness, and that they see a strange vessel being a sail to be sold to a Turk and they stand by, looking on, and say in Turkish, 'So, the white man sells his own Turk's dog?' and that some would say, though they say they are Christians, 'I don't care though they be black we will sell them to the Turk, for liberty to have the white man's dog to be sold to the Turk.' To bring me the dog, I will sell them against their will, as the dog's name."

If there was any one thing of which these settlers had a scruple prior to their emigration to America, it was government, and so it happened that, in 1691 when Germantown was incorporated, no one wanted to hold office, and government perished, and remained dead for years, there being lack of political ambition. Never before had the world beheld the sight of a sturdy community, prospering, thriving, and growing, and spreading out without the sign of a court, magistrate, policeman, or officer of any sort. When in later years a jail was built, it long time remained idle for lack of evil doers.

This was not the only curious thing which happened to the first German settlement in America. Twenty years before their arrival, during the time that New York was a Dutch colony, the government of the Netherlands planted a colony of Dutch Mennonites, under Cornelius Ploekboij, in New Jersey. Later, when England undertook to wrest the colony of New Amsterdam from the Dutch, some British soldiers overboard, one fine morning, on the peaceful Mennonite colony, and put the settlers to the sword, none escaping except Ploekboij and his wife, for which service the English viking was knighted. For years Ploekboij and his wife wandered about in the wilderness living among the Indians, at last to find a home among the people of Germantown.

Pastorius, the leader and founder of the Germantown colony, died in 1719. For some reason, his burial place was lost, and, in speaking of the matter, Miss Bittinger says that, in his 1874 English preface to type, one might also say of the German Moses that "No man knoweth his sepulchre to this day."

Pastorius was the author of several very quaint and curious books, which with some of his personal belongings, are in the possession of the Pennsylvania Historical Society; and an effort is now being made by the local Germans to bring them to Washington for exhibit during the celebration, in November, of the founding of one of the most remarkable colonies ever planted by the German race.
